BY R. W. DE L.

While darkness veils the twilight lone and sweet,
Here and I muse amid the shades of night,
Waiting: I miss the patter of thy feet,
While hope and doubt responsive measures beat,
As scenes flit by—across my memory's sight.

In fruitless thought, I see around me still,
A gloom 'er darker than creeps o'er the day:
Yet still I list, as one who turns to feel,
The solemn cadence heard in yonder peal,
While memories' train, tread o'er the same old way.

My heart recalls from out the hours ago Fair places we together staid beside;
Even like sweet dreams that fancy builds upon:
While 'neath I stand, 'mid shadows that e'er bide,

Alike unchanged, the gloom or sunshine glide.

I loved thee then, nor breezes came to fret
That happy time when burning sunlight shone Across our path; nor can I now forget Mid barren heights, or muse without regret,
For earth was then a melody—my own.

Thy life should blossom fair—then shall I blame,
Or backward gaze, with yearning, pensive eyes,
I keep our secrets here, and ne'er may name Thro' unassuming remorse, or bitter shame,
The word that wrecked upon thy being lies.

Ah! well, who knows, should'st thou but come again,
And look from dreamy orbs as wont of old:
Or while the twilight veiled the crimson plain Four out sweet echoes to thy plaintive strain,
Or once again of my brown hand take hold.

But it is over—'er as breezes laugh
A sigh unconscious swells the stricken heart
And coldly turning to the world's behalf I struggling hide, love's golden epithet, While yet the soulless thing is loth to part,

Farewell bright days that never shall return,
Night-gloom is not more dreary than the day
When soul regrets o'er phantom pictures yearn In thick'ning sadness, 'till wild men's voices beam
And ere to bleak December fairest May.

Farewell! O Love, thro' many a tangled maze My tired feet may bear me sadly on;
Remembering as a vision, happy days
Ere life's grim pilgrimage disclosed its phase
From out the sunny time in hours gone.

RESULT OF AN ELOPEMENT.

About three months ago a girl named Mary Shattuck came to this city from Oregon, having run away from her father's farm in company with a young man named Pashal Smith. After the couple had left the Westfoot country Chief Crowley received a dispatch informing him of the elopement and requesting him to arrest the runaways.

On their arrival at this port the Chief arrested and held them until the father and mother of the girl came down.

On the arrival of the girl's parents, it being made evident to them that their daughter had passed on the steamer as the wife of Smith, they agreed that she should marry him. Accordingly a marriage license was procured and the couple made one flesh by Judge Lunderback.
Smith then refused to go back to Oregon and his wife was inclined to share his fortunes in this city. The parents of the girl gave her a small sum of money and in sorrow returned to their home in Oregon.

Smith is a young man of but little education, never worked at a trade, and when the money given them by the girl's parents was gone they had a hard fight to get on. He could get no work, the rent on their miserable lodgings in a Geary street house became overdue and they were given notice to hunt another lodging. In the midst of all this the girl was taken dangerously ill, and her husband could not provide anything for her.

This crisis in their domestic affairs was unexpected, and the husband being unable to do anything for his wife, some charitable persons secured her admission to the County Hospital, where she is at the present time. Chief Crowley heard of this misfortune on the part of the young girl, and learning that she was desirous of getting home, he interested himself and secured her a free passage on one of Ben Holliday's steamers, and last Wednesday she leaves for Oregon. Smith is still in this city, and he will be forced to remain here. No sympathy is felt for him, as he induced the girl to leave a good home by his promises. She has been taught a lesson that will probably keep her from roaming from the old home again. [S. F.
Chronicle, 9th.]

The progress of the Utah Southern Railroad is set forth in a letter from C.
D. Erickson to the Salt Lake Herald, being dated Sept. 10, Nov. 20:

I have finished the final location of the Railroad line through Salt Creek canyon, up and over the divide between Utah and Sanpete counties. The heavy grade is two hundred feet to the mile. The grading work will be very light.

Keep yourself innocent if you would be happy.
